OUR CHILDREN'S CORNER

"Well had the boding tremblers learned to trace The day's disaster in his morning face, Full well they laughed with counterfeited glee

At all his jokes, for many a joke had he; Full well the busy whisper circling round Conveyed the dismal tidings when he frowned." (Goldsmith's "Deserted Village.")

BEFORE THE SANDMAN COMES

"Dear me, no! I would much rather be the sunset. I like the whole sunset better than just the sun

Now who do you suppose was talking? Birds? Fairies? Children? No, none of those; Two flowers were talking together and their talk was in the long ago fairyland time of the world,

In those days all flowers were white—white as the clouds and as snow, and every flower could talk so plainly that the fairies and birds and creatures could understand and talk back equally well.

These two particular flowers who talked about the sun were cannas. Lovely white cannas that thrust their glistening petals above the green leaves like icebergs pushed out of the

there was time for the first canna to answer—the fairy queen walked by.
"Good afternoon," she said to the cannas, in her cordial, polite little way, "is there anything I can do for you today?" "Do for us!" exclaimed the cannas together, "what do you mean?"

"I mean this," answered the fairy queen, "this is wishing day. I am around collecting wishes, every plant may make one, and who knows?-

"Then I wish to be yellow!" "I wish to be red!"

Both the cannas spoke at once, and so suddenly the fairy queen was surprised.

"Dear me, how quick you made up your minds," she said, "you must have been thinking about it before."

"We were," the two cannas assured her. "And I want to be yellow," the first canna repeated. "And I want to be red," added the second.

The fairy queen was puzzled. You see she had expected to make each kind of flower a color, and now two flowers of the same kind wished to be different colors.

"I don't know what to think about that," she said; "won't either of you give up?"

"I don't like red," said the first canna, "I'd rather be white!" "I'm sure I don't like yellow," the second canna assured her positively. "Very well, then," said the fairy queen, making up her mind quickly "you may both have your wishes," and she waved her magic wand. Quick as a flash, the white of the blossoms melted to yellow and to red, and the gorgeous cannas faced each

FIGHT OVER A GIRL LEADS TO MAN'S ARREST

GOD'S BLESSING, SAYS Denied Admittance to Her Home, Visitor Fires at Her Brothers. A fight over a girl he knew in Sicily six years ago, in which he is accused of firing three shots at her brothers, led to the arraignment today before Magistrate Carson, at the Second and Grieving Over Europe's Christian streets station, of John Monte, 1122 Kater street. He was held in $800 ball for court. The girl is Miss Jernie Ross, 16 years old, 721 South Ninth street. Her brothers are John and Pletro Ross. The family came here from Italy six months ago. Monte had been here for six years. He had known Miss Ross as a child in their native land and he used this acquaintance, the girl testified, to force his attentions on her.

Monte called at the Ross house last night and was refused admittance. Then, according to the girl, he called the brothers across the street and a fight started. In the middle of it Monte is accused of drawing a revolver and firing three shots.

One bullet passed through the shirt of John Ross, just grazing the skin. Policeman Isola heard the shots and chased Monte through streets and alleys to Delhi and South streets, where he
